

Chapter 9: Discursive Psychology

Corcoran, T. (2010) [Commentary on] What else life if not awkward? British Journal of Social Psychology, 49(4): 679-684

Potter, J. (2010) Contemporary discursive psychology: Issues, prospects, and Corcoran's awkward ontology, British Journal of Social Psychology, 49(4):657-678

These two articles make for useful reading and cover points of debate and tensions in relation to the 'current' state of discursive psychology.

Cresswell, J. (2012) Including social discourses and experience in research on refugees, race and ethnicity, Discourse & Society, 23(5):553-575

Demuth, C. (2012) On living social discourse, embodiment and culture: The potential of a broadened conception of discursive psychology, Discourse & Society, 23(5):589-595

These two articles provide a useful discussion in relation to extending the focus of discursive psychology, particularly in incorporating phenomenological aspects and further concern to broad social discourses.

The following are further examples of studies using a discourse analysis methodology:

Childs, C. & Murray, C. (2010) "We all had an experience in there together": A Discursive Psychological Analysis of Collaborative Paranormal Accounts by Paranormal Investigation Team Members, Qualitative Research in Psychology, 7(1):21-33

Charlebois, J. (2010) The discursive construction of femininities in the accounts of Japanese women, Discourse Studies, 12(6):699-714

Chasin, C.J. & Radtke, H. L. (2013) "Friend Moments": A Discursive Study of Friendship, Qualitative Research in Psychology, 10(3):274-297